

In Genesis 26, Isaac moved to the valley to get away from the local Philistines' opposition. He could have fought them and won. Once in the valley, he reopened two wells that were rightfully his, but local herders quarrelled over the wells, so he let them have the wells. One of the wells he named "Argument", and the other "Opposition." He knew that although he could have kept them, it would not be worth the ongoing strife and conflict. He then dug a third well that was not contested, and he named it "Room Enough" or "Wide-Open Spaces".

Too often we get bogged down at the 'wells of argument and opposition', trying to prove our point and convince people we are right. Sometimes you need to stay and fight for what belongs to you, but some battles that you could win are not worth fighting. There are times when you need to walk away and leave it up to God. Take the high road to the valley where there is room enough, abundance, and wide-open places.

Genesis 26:22 "Abandoning that one, he dug again, and the local residents finally left him alone. So he called it: "The Well Of Room Enough For Us At Last!", "For now at last", he said, "the Lord has made room for us and we shall thrive."
